We got up early and headed to find the rental car return spot. That was a funny adventure. The roads were blocked off due to construction and was crazy adventuring around. We wound up getting into a toll road at one point and the lady asked us where we were going and she was so funny when she told the taxi driver behind us to just back up and we did! The road we needed to be on was in sight and she didn't want us going the wrong way for a long time and we didn't either. So we backed up as lots of cars were entering the toll area. So funny to hear her Boston accent say "Just back up! Just back up!"

I was relieved to get on the plane with the kids as I felt the first wave of Hailey's virus getting to me. Usually I can wipe their noses, lick their faces, you get the picture without getting sick. This bug was a little bit more mean and it meant business. I tried to make doctors appointments from the airport in Dallas for Hailey. I couldn't get into the Norman clinic luckily and the appointment time that was available would have been at the same time as that tornado that decided to pass by that area. I declined and made an appointment for Hailey for the clinic here the next day. We had another round of good flights.

Once we got here, we were famished and stopped at Coits for some food. Then I was startled by Brady's LOUD CB weather alert for potential storms and severe weather. We decided to eat as we drove and headed home after a quick stop for some gas. We got home after it had been raining for a short bit.

Brady headed to turn on the television and Hailey headed immediately to find Penguino and introduce her to her new penguin friend! (The smallest penguin is from Brady. He brought it back to Hailey when he went to DC last year.) We sat and watched tornado after tornado report come in on the television. I was a little panicked at first and relieved when we were in the clear. I crashed on the couch for the night and Brady wound up putting the kids in bed.

