Six months seems to fly by super fast. Hailey went in last week for another teeth cleaning. She likes going just like I do and is a great patient. She mainly likes the reward at the end. A new toothbrush, some floss and a few stickers! I personally like the feeling right after they get all cleaned. She got a clean bill and Hunter got some more observation time. He isn't quite sure about the whole thing yet. Hopefully at his next appointment he will actually open up his mouth. Baby Annabell tagged along. She has resurfaced from the crib lately :). The dentist showed me where her 12 year molars are forming. She will lose a couple more teeth but won't after that for a few more years and then those molars will surface. To get her through these years and to protect those back teeth, she had sealants put on all four of her existing molars. The hygienist for the sealants was great and efficient. Hailey tolerated this procedure but would have rather had her teeth cleaned.

Since they were good and it was still early and cool in the day, we went to the rocket park and the free museum next door. We had a good time playing in the park, looking at old pieces in the museum and playing in the play area. We could have omitted the naughty, smart mouthed little girl who was there though. She wound up getting herself a time out on her bed for saying mean things to Hailey. Hailey stood up for herself but at the time I wouldn't have minded had Hailey said something mean back. That little girl was a mess. We played some more at the park and then were off to get lunch and play more at home. I am loving these relaxed, summer days.

Here are some horrible cell phone pictures!

I also got to explain these fun green stamps that Hailey was interested in viewing.

But I did not explain this so call birthing chair to her - That is a hunk of uncomfortable wood

For Papa!

Wish we had this in Hunter's room. It was so cool and old. Loved it!
