A couple days before school let out, Hunter wound up with a tummy bug. He had the whole weekend to recover and went to school for the last 3 days. He acted fine. No fever. Appetite not quite back to normal and had an occasional loose bowel. Fast forward to last weekend. He woke up needing to throw up and he was in my bed at the time. Luckily he got out of the bed. Hunter is not the most cooperative kid when he is asleep or even half asleep or pretty much anytime after he has retired for the night. I tried getting him to quickly move towards the bathroom. But in his state he also had a massive diarrhea explosion. I wound up yelling at him to move but in his sleepy state could not get it all together. I was more upset at his non-listening ability then than the massive amounts of poop he managed to get all over the carpet IN MY ROOM! I cleaned him up, wiped the floor and put towels down all over the place and vacated the room for the night. He spend the entire night literally throwing up and having loose bowels almost every half an hour. I have no clue where it was all coming from in his little body. He continued to have loose bowels for days. I made a call to my doctor to see about some relief. I now have a stockpile for next time too. It only took a couple doses and he stopped all the vomiting and yucky bowels. Then we all took turns getting his bug. Hailey got it the least. The first loose bowel I encouraged her to take the Imodium. I have never used that on my children. Never needed to but after dealing with Hunter, I strongly encouraged her! It worked. I am also pretty sure Grayson had it from the time Hunter got ill the first time. He has had several yucky diapers daily and I was done. I also found out he is getting his back molars in as well. Explains the ear holding for about an hour one night. It will take some time coming in I am sure but they are bulging! Poor guy. I hope this is the last of it all. I am done cleaning but now we have freshly cleaned carpets in the house again so all is well :)

